Boundary Notice

This is not a legal instrument, governance framework, or funding mechanism, and it does not function as one. It doesn't set up a way to give money, and it doesn't promise anything to anyone who might. It states one boundary only: support may help preserve the archive. It does not purchase control over what the archive means or contains.

1. Preservation Support

Keeping documents available over time has ordinary costs — hosting, storage, domains, mirrors. Websites lapse, accounts get lost, and services change their terms; none of that is dramatic, it's just what happens to things left online long enough. If support is ever needed to cover those ordinary costs, it helps the archive stay reachable. There's nothing unusual about this — it's the same kind of upkeep any small, independent project needs to keep existing. That's the whole function of any such support: continuity, not influence.

2. What Support Does Not Buy

Support does not purchase ownership of the archive, editorial control over its texts, interpretive authority over what it means, governance rights, certification power, or any say over final documents. Helping keep something available is not the same as having a claim on what it says. Paying a hosting bill and writing the words are different acts, and only one of them determines the content.

3. Decentralized Stewardship Without Decentralized Authority

The archive may exist in more than one place — mirrored across platforms and repositories so it doesn't depend on any single host or account. That matters only for continuity: one host disappearing shouldn't mean the archive disappears with it. It's a preservation choice, not a shared-ownership arrangement. A mirror keeps a copy available; it doesn't make the host a co-author. A future steward, if one is ever needed, preserves access and file integrity — not the authority to reinterpret or redirect the archive's meaning.

4. Legal / Financial Separation

This statement is not a legal instrument, nonprofit charter, fundraising contract, tax statement, donation policy, donor agreement, or financial promise. It does not make any contribution tax-deductible. Actual donations, grants, sponsorships, nonprofit formation, fiscal sponsorship, tax reporting, succession planning, and archive ownership questions require proper legal and accounting structure outside this document. Nothing here substitutes for that. If real funding is ever involved, the right next step is a lawyer or accountant, not another page of this archive.

5. Closing Boundary

Support may preserve access. Support may not purchase authority. Whatever funding the archive ever needs, the actual structure for handling it — legal, financial, or otherwise — has to be built separately from this statement, not inferred from it. This document only marks where that line sits; it doesn't try to hold it by itself.
